ANALYSIS OF CURRENT EVENTS

A resolvable frozen conflict? Designing a settlement for Transnistria

Stefán Wolf

University of Birmingham, UK

The conflict over Transnistria is a territorial dispute in which one of the conflict parties (Transnistria) seeks independence while the other (Moldova) aims to restore its full sovereignty and territorial integrity. For close to two decades, the situation has been stagnant: a ceasefire agreement signed in 1992 in Moscow between the Russian and Moldovan presidents at the time – Boris Yeltsin and Mircea Snegur – established a bilateral peacekeeping mission (Russia, Moldova, Transnistria) and a buffer zone along the Dniester/Notru River. Punctuated by these arrangements and an additional Russian military presence, Transnistria has developed into a de facto state of its own, albeit without international recognition and heavily dependent on Russia.

Transnistria: The Fate of the Jews and Romas

Dennis Deletant

Abstract

Transnistria was set up in consequence of successful military operations beyond the Dniester in summer 1941 and lost when it became untenable in early 1944. Between those dates Romanian officials administered the area and were responsible for the native Ukrainian Jews and the Romanian Jews deported there.

The road to conflict resolution: A comparative analysis of frozen conflicts in the OSCE area

Abstract | Full Text

In this paper the authors comparatively analyze the frozen conflicts in the OSCE area with an objective to discover specific features of the road to their resolution. An accent has been put on the post-Soviet conflicts, while Kosovo and Cyprus are treated as subsidiary cases. A decisive element of the frozen conflict definition is a dichotomy between the legal and factual state regarding territorial changes which took place as a consequence of an armed conflict. Thus, the international law aspect is the most important in considering possibilities for settlement of these conflicts. Other aspects which are analyzed in the paper are security, energy, economic, and democratic ones. The common conclusion of the analysis of each of these aspects is that the USA and Russia are the key actors which influence these frozen conflicts' resolution. In the absence of their consensus, these conflicts are doomed to remain frozen in the long run.

Hierarchy in Moldova-Russia Relations: the Transnistrian Effect

Abstract | Full Text

This article examines the effect of the Transnistrian area on Moldova-Russia relations. David Lake's concept of hierarchy will be used as the theoretical framework. The article examines why Russia's mechanisms of influence should be seen as a reflection of a hierarchical relationship between Russia and Moldova. The article begins by explaining why this work has chosen a hierarchical framework and a brief introduction of Transnistria. This is followed by two sections of analysis: security and economy. These two sections will also contain subsections on events that highlight the hierarchical nature of the Moldova-Russia relationship. This article shows that Russia clearly has a hierarchical relationship with Moldova. David Lake's theory proves to be a useful tool in understanding Moldo-Russian relations.

Abstract | Full Text

The study I propose approaches the world of Transnistria's ghettos from a social perspective, my focus being on the reconstruction of the survival networks developed under the virtually exterminatory conditions of the ghettos as well as the parallel realities of official rules and inmates' alternative social structures. The theoretical approach follows the line developed by Erez Goffman and his conceptualization of the coercive systems as total institutions.
